There is a widely held belief that a concussive injury to the brain will result in a period of temporary but complete cognitive dysfunction. Some authors have suggested that this cognitive dysfunction is marked by a characteristic pattern of disruption of information processing. However, more recent research suggests that the cognitive sequelae following a concussion may be more varied.

This article reviews the literature regarding the cognitive effects of concussion. We discuss the limitations of the existing research and suggest areas where further research is needed. We conclude by presenting a new framework that is based on evidence from the literature regarding the cognitive sequelae of concussion.Kochi: Two test results confirmed that a 50-year-old man who complained of headache and fever had COVID-19, the first local case of coronavirus in Kerala on Tuesday. He is currently in a stable condition at a local hospital, a source said. The case involved a native of Kochi who is now undergoing a thorough examination to ascertain if he developed the infection from China. He had travelled to China from mid-March on a business trip and returned to India on March 18. He first reported symptoms on March 23 and then sought treatment at a private hospital on March 26. His family members were tested and found negative for the disease. A team of epidemiologists, virologists and clinical experts visited the man at his residence on Monday after he developed severe pneumonia. "His condition is stable, but the concern is that his health could deteriorate," a source said. The source said the Kochi police conducted a random testing of the man's neighbours and business associates in the vicinity. A sample of the man's food was also sent to a private lab for testing. The family and friends of the man who lives with his wife and their two sons are under quarantine. Read:
